The Wright Family's Christmas Mix-Up

It was Christmas Eve at the Wright house, and everything was almost ready for the big family celebration. Mrs. Wright had baked dozens of cookies, wrapped every present, and even left the stockings perfectly hung on the mantel. But something didn't feel quite right.

"Where's the turkey?" she asked, spinning around to check the counter. "I left it right here!"

Mr. Wright looked up from untangling the Christmas lights. "You left it where?"

"Right here! On the counter!" she said, pointing to an empty tray. But the turkey was gone—vanished. Not a crumb left.

The Wright twins, Lucy and Liam, froze. "Uh oh," Liam whispered. "We might've... left it outside when we brought in the groceries."

"You left the turkey outside?!" Mrs. Wright gasped. "It's probably frozen solid or dragged off by raccoons by now!"

Mr. Wright sighed. "Alright, alright, don't panic. I'll go right out and check." He grabbed his boots and coat and marched out the door—only to slip on the icy steps. "I'm alright!" he shouted, lying flat on his back in the snow.

Mrs. Wright shook her head. "I told you to put salt down yesterday!"

"I did! Right after breakfast, before I left for work!" he protested, brushing snow off his hat.

Back inside, Grandma Wright was sipping cocoa and chuckling. "You kids are doing great," she said. "This is exactly why I left dinner up to you this year. Keeps me entertained."

Mr. Wright came back in holding the turkey triumphantly. "Found it! It was sitting right on top of the car. Must've slid right off the roof when I left the garage door open."

Mrs. Wright groaned. “Oh, good. A slightly frozen, possibly road-dusted turkey. Just what I wanted.”

“Hey, we can fix it!” said Lucy. “We’ll put it in the oven right now and crank up the heat!”

Mrs. Wright hesitated. “That doesn’t sound like the right way to cook a turkey...” But she gave in, because at this point, there wasn’t much left to lose.

While the turkey roasted (questionably), the Wright family decorated the tree. The star went up, the lights twinkled just right, and even the cat, Mr. Whiskers, left the ornaments alone for once. Everything was finally looking merry and bright—until the smell hit.

“Is something burning?” Grandma Wright asked.

“Oh no!” shouted Liam. “The turkey!”

They all ran to the kitchen, where smoke was pouring out of the oven. Mrs. Wright opened the door and sighed. “Well, that’s that. Guess there’s nothing left of dinner.”

The family looked around, then burst out laughing. Mr. Wright grabbed the phone. “Alright, pizza it is! I’ll call the place down the street—they’re open late!”

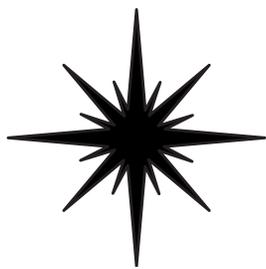

Within 30 minutes, the delivery guy showed up right on time with a stack of pizzas and a grin. “Merry Christmas, Wrights! You guys keeping me busy tonight!”

Mrs. Wright handed him a tip and said, “You’re saving Christmas, right here, right now.” There’s nothing left to say but thank you!

They all gathered around the table, sharing pizza by the glow of the tree. Grandma Wright raised her glass of cocoa. “Sometimes,” she said, “things don’t go right—but when you’ve got family, laughter, and pizza, there’s nothing left to complain about.”

Everyone cheered, and Mr. Wright grinned. “Alright everyone, who’s ready for presents?”

And just like that, the night was exactly right—even if the turkey never was.
